

Between the lines

The CIA is cleaning up its image, reports New York magazine. Recently, Washington's Harvard Business Club was invited to CIA headquarters in Langley, Va., where Director William Colby [left] served up cocktails and hard sell, complete with charts and graphs. One area of discussion was the Israeli Six-Day War, which CIA intelligence agents had not foreseen. The problem, Colby said, was that the agency had not "planned enough irrationality" into the Middle East situation. In the future, Colby promised the Harvard group, the agency would make every effort to provide more "irrationality."
